

Legislative history to be available online

The B.C. public will soon have free online access to read legislation, regulations and other documents dating back to 1872, the provincial government announced Wednesday. The province will begin to move information that had only been available online with a paid subscription to a new free section of its B.C. Laws website, said the Ministry of Technology, Innovation and Citizens' Services. That will allow the public access to cabinet orders in council, which are used to set regulations, staff appointments and make other key decisions on how government is run. The information, to come online in the next several months, will be searchable and have an open licence for personal and commercial use.

BY VANCOUVER SUN    APRIL 3, 2014

The B.C. public will soon have free online access to read legislation, regulations and other documents dating back to 1872, the provincial government announced Wednesday. The province will begin to move information that had only been available online with a paid subscription to a new free section of its B.C. Laws website, said the Ministry of Technology, Innovation and Citizens' Services. That will allow the public access to cabinet orders in council, which are used to set regulations, staff appointments and make other key decisions on how government is run. The information, to come online in the next several months, will be searchable and have an open licence for personal and commercial use.

© (c) CanWest MediaWorks Publications Inc.